

Crepuscular rays are formed when beams of sunlight shine through breaks in cloud cover. The beams become visible as the sunlight reflects off of particles in the atmosphere, and are enhanced by shadows cast between the rays by intervening clouds.

